You're Eyeing the Future. So Is Arent Fox.

Experience and accomplishments clearly demonstrate the breadth of our government relations capabilities, but what issues will drive your business in the future? What are your legislative priorities?

- NIMBY issues—Not In My Backyard—are ever more a hot button in energy development. Siting of plants, transmission facilities, and oil and gas fields will become more arduous and complex.
- Surface and groundwater rights, clean water policy and regulations, and wetlands and waterway issues become more important as populations grow and demand rises.
- Whether solar, wind, geothermal, nuclear or biofuels, clean energy technology and alternative fuel businesses and organizations face increasingly complex industry, financial and regulatory environments.
- Federal support for projects and programs is often critical, and for that you need smart, well-connected partners in Washington, DC.
- Energy tax policies, credits and incentives can make or break a company or consortium. As Congress considers comprehensive tax reform, you'll need to define your position and refine your pitch.
- Energy exports of all kinds will continue to dominate the minds of government officials leading to significant public policy activity.
